which sank April 15, 1913, has been completed at Quincy. It portrays in a most complete manner the bravery a most complete manner the bravery of the men who sacrificed their lives that women and children might be saved. The statue was designed by Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, a daughter of Cornelius Vanderbilt, and carved from one block of red granite quarried in Westerly. The statue, decldedly that of a masculine man, stands 13 feet high and is 12 feet and 6 inches from tip to tip of the fingers on outstretched arms. The pedestal which is not yet executed will be 12 feet square at the base and ten feet high, giving the monument, when erected, a total height of twenty-three feet. Work on the pedestal is not to be started until the national government definitely donates a site.

The statue expresses the thought that when American manhood was put that when American manhood was put to a test it was found capable of making a grand Christian sacrifice in setting an example which the world can never forset. The majority of death is apparent throughout; the outstretched arms symbolizing the sacrifice. The expression on the massive upturned face, the dropped eyelids, as well as the poise of the figure about to take the final plunge into eternity, typify the resignation, speaking more positively than words: "The hour has come; I am resigned." When quarried at Westerly the granite block contained 728 cubic feet, which is a weight of 50 tons. The figure is in the form of a croos, so under the arms there was much waste
